We are committed to continuously improving the survivor experience, ensuring that everyone accessing our services feels safe, supported, and empowered. This is made possible by our fantastic, dedicated staff team and an organisational culture driven by passion, care and excellence both for the people we serve and for our colleagues.

This pivotal role will ensure that accurate, high-quality data is used to demonstrate the impact of our work, drive continuous service improvement, inform strategic decision-making, and meet the reporting requirements of commissioners and funders.

Working collaboratively with operational teams, external stakeholders and senior leaders, you will translate complex data into meaningful insights. This will support evidence-based practice and help improve outcomes for survivors of domestic abuse.

Based in Bradford and reporting to the Director of Quality, Safeguarding and Partnerships, this is an exciting opportunity to influence organisational development and contribute to the delivery of high-quality, survivor-focused services.

“Many people who leave abusive relationships face an uncertain financial future and as an understanding, compassionate and supportive employer, we can further assist survivors to gain their independence through employment so that they can rebuild their lives and live safely.” Yasmin Khan, Staying Put CEO.

We often find that candidates have lived experience and want to use what they have gone through to “give back”. We support colleagues by offering line manager support, regular supervision, external clinical supervision, peer support, an Employee Assistance Programme and a financial wellbeing benefit.

We are committed to ensuring positive mental health whilst at work and take our duty of care towards our employees seriously. Staying Put have signed up to the Mental Health at Work Commitment so have pledged to achieving better mental health outcomes and longer-term positive impacts on our employee’s wellbeing.
